Subject: [EXT]: On Docket 51

Dear Erica Y. Williams,

Thank you, Chair Williams, for ensuring auditors hold corporations accountable for their actions and protect investors from fraud. Undetected and detected corporate fraud causes a staggering $830 billion equity value loss annually.

Auditors must serve as public watchdogs, ensuring transparency and integrity in financial reporting. But too often, they've enabled corporate misconduct and financial fraud instead of protecting investors and the public.

The Public Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB) must require auditors to proactively detect noncompliance with laws and regulations to minimize corporate misconduct and financial fraud. This is crucial in today's climate crisis and energy transition, where fossil fuel companies are breaking environmental laws and polluting communities.

I support the proposed guidance's recommendations that auditors should proactively identify companies' noncompliance with laws and regulations, especially where environmental and social harms are rampant. Auditors can safeguard investors and communities from financial losses and environmental pollution.

Too many firms engage in greenwashing, making bold promises without real action. Auditors should prevent misleading information to investors and ensure that companies' actions align with their public statements.

Auditors cannot ignore the growing risk of corporate fraud and environmental harm by fossil fuel companies. The PCAOB must finalize and strengthen these auditing standards to boost corporate accountability to protect investors and the public writ large.

Sincerely,
